less. Yale University. Political Science. All Departments. 880 Documents.Â Second, it uses an original survey carried out in Bolivia following the adoption of a non-contributory national minimum pension in 2007. It shows that the perception of labor market risk is a strong determinant of support for social policy expansion. Insiders that opposed the expansion of benefits were sensitive to the issue of how inclusion of outsiders would support their benefit stream. Finally, the paper shows that partisanship, more specifically support for Evo Morales' MAS party is a strong predictor of support for the national minimum pension. Save to Library. Download.
