The Zuni people, like other Pueblo Indians, are believed to be the descendants of the Ancient Puebloans who lived in the desert Southwest of New Mexico, Arizona, Southern Colorado, and Utah for a thousand years. Today the Zuni Pueblo, some 35 miles south of Gallup, New Mexico has a population of about 6,000. Archeological evidence shows they have lived in this location for about 1,300 years. Their tribal name is Ashíshiwí (Shíshíwí), meaning "the flesh." Zuni life, much like it was in the past, is still deeply religious and very different from that of other tribes. The Zuni gods are believed to reside in the lakes of Arizona and New Mexico. The chiefs and the shamans carry out ceremonies during religious festivals. Judith had first travelled to Zuni Pueblo a year ago, armed with only a rudimentary understanding of the issues. She arrived in Albuquerque, New Mexico, on a blazing hot, dry day in mid-August. The heat only intensified as she drove west from the airport towards Zuni Indian Reservation into the scorching sun, crossing a desert spotted with scraggly sagebrush and juniper. those policies on the Zuni way of life, which could no longer revolve around agriculture closely tied to a system of sustainable. land management that was designed to conserve scarce water.
