This book manages to bring together theory and practice based on many years experience by the authors, of travelling nationally and internationally to lecture and lead workshops, addressing the urgent need for a 'great turning' in the way we understand the environment and our place in the natural world. The book is a good resource for all those who are concerned about environmental and ecological issues regardless of their faith tradition.

Joanna Macy is a Buddhist who has lectured on Buddhist philosophy, systems theory and deep ecology. She has written six books previous to this one including: World as Lover, World as Self and Thinking Like a Mountain..

Molly Young Brown as well as being a workshop leader and consultant has written three previous books on spirituality and healing the environment including: Growing Whole: Self-Realization on an Endangered Planet..

Coming Back To Life is accessible to everyone even though it offers ways of thinking and being which are challenging. It is no academic tome but will stimulate scholars and the general reader alike. The first half of the book puts forward the arguments for a changed way of thinking and the second half offers clear guidelines on how to lead workshops and meditations. Although the exercises are aimed at group work I have found that some of the practices are equally valuable in offering ideas of engaging with the material when alone. .

Non USA readers might find some of the expressions and exercises different in that some of the exercises are nation specific. In spite of this the basis of the theory and exercises are applicable universally and can be adapted to the workshop leader's own experience. .

The 'Table of Contents' are detailed and perhaps the best way of offering a review of this valuable resource. The detailed index demonstrates that in this book of 220 pages the chapters are broken down into short manageable sections. .

You're unhealthy. Our health has become a real problem. We wonder why we feel tired, sick and get headaches. We all experience health challenges at some point in our life. How many health challenges we experience in our younger years will come down to food and exercise. The strategies for being healthy haven't changed. The people around us often hold us back. They fill our minds with limiting beliefs, stories and goals that give us no sense of meaning. Friends can kill our dreams or make us believe something we never thought was possible. Solution Use your life to do something that gives you meaning and then you no longer see death as a problem when it comes upon you. Peace, love and respect thanks for reading. Call To Action.
