Description:

From Publishers Weekly In this relatable, down-to-earth book, Williamson explicates A Course in Miracles, which she describes as "a self-study program of spiritual psychotherapy." Both A Course in Miracles and Williamson's work borrow heavily from the Christian lexicon: she refers to God as "he" and speaks often of the Holy Spirit and Jesus. Her take-home message is that we must submit not to our egos, which tell us we are separate from God, but instead surrender to God, of whom we are all a part. While she does refer to all minds being joined and describes the world we know as a dream from which we must awaken, she differs from other New Thought and New Age thinkers by balancing an assumption that the negative things of this world (especially illness and adversity) are illusory with the fact that they feel real to us and that we must take practical steps to overcome them. She recommends embracing love and eschewing fear, arguing that we will encounter a loving world when we stop assuming it is hostile. She says that while we are not responsible for the bad things that happen to us, the universe is always primed to give us a new beginning, if only we can forgive, atone and trust that our loving attitudes and good works make a profound difference. Edmund was in the process of saying thank you for his gift. Lucy smiled, watching him, and remembered that this was his first time meeting Father Christmas. He seemed to be thoroughly enjoying the experience and she was very happy for him. A vague memory of another Christmas, celebrated somewhere else, came to mind. A Christmas without a visit from Father Christmas, although Lucy had been told by her parents that he visited when all the children were asleep. And now, looking at the very same man standing in front of her while she was very much awake caused her to wonder. As soon as Edmund was done thanking him Lucy stepped forward and all eyes were on her. "Father Christmas, sir," she said, feeling shy than she had in a long time, "may I ask you a question?"
